An Elopement with Tragical Con-

A merchant of standing and wealth, not far from Binghamton, N. Y., had a family consisting of his wife and several children. The lady had great personal beauty, was very accomplished and intelligent, a capital housekeeper and carnest Christain, and greatly devoted to her family. Not far from her residence lived a young lady of 23 summers, tall, coarse-featured, and as unattractive as could be imagined. Her mother was dead, and she kept house for her father. The visits of the merchant to this house attracted considerable attention. It was known, howevable attention. It was known, howev-er, that the father was generally present at the visits of the merchant, and the community was generally divided about the matter. Riding and walking succeeded, and the scandal became generative.

One Monday morning the merchant informed his wife that he was going to leave—that he was going to sail for California, and take the girl with him.— Her father, he said, had given his consent, and agreed to keep the thing secret until after his departure. He told her that no power could prevent his leaving. If she kept quiet until after he was gone, he would give her the house in which she lived and $2,000 in money. If she did not, he would go all the same, but would leave her penniless. asked her to fix his linen and pack his trunk, and have it ready by Thursday morning, all of which she agreed to do. He bought a trunk for the girl, and gave her $200 for her outfit.

On Thursday morning he left his home. While his hand was on the door latch his wife told him that she should remain just where she was, and take care of the children, and if at any time he wished to come back the door would be open to him. He went over to the house where the young woman was in waiting. He gave her fathersome mon-cy, and he accompanied the parties to the cars. On their way down the fath-er referred to some expenses he had in-curred in giving his daughter music lessons. The merchant handed him $200, which he pronounced satisfactory. After the train had started the old man told the story of the elopement. When some one remarked to him that the merchant would desert his daughter as he had his wife, he said that it was impossible, for he had never seen such love before. When he was asked why he did not put a stop to a step that could only be fraught with misery to all sides, said that his daughter, when she told him of her intended journey, showed him a bottle of poison, and said if he opened his head on the matter till after she was gone she would poison herself and him too. And she would have done it, he said.

The sequel to this affair is more than usually tragical. The parties sailed immediately for California, and for some reason not explained, took the return vessel back to New York. They landed in the city where the girl was left at a hotel penniless. She succeeded in reaching Binghamton, deserted and ruined, and sent immediately to her father, who visited her at the hotel .-She agreed to go home with him the next morning. He called for her at the time agreed upon. He found her a corpse. She had committed suicide during the night.

In the mean time the merchant had not been heard from after deserting the girl at the hotel. Ten days ago he appeared at the door of his own house .frue to her promise and to her womanly love, his wife threw the doors wide open, and bade him welcome. Hidden from the eyes of his neighbors and friends he remains indoors. The community are equally divided whether he ought to be tarred and feathered or forgiven.
